[From the True Flag.] CHOOSING A PROPESSION;

The Broken-Down Minister.

· There, John is she done!' said Joseph Broadley. an intelligent boy of fifteen, as he pointed his friend to a very perfect model of a fore and-aft schooner, which he had just completed.

The miniature vessel stood upon the work-bench in his father's shop. The finishing touches had just veyed his handiwork with conscious delight. She is beautiful, isn't she Joe ?- I wish I could lo that,' replied John Emerson.

· Perhaps you could, if you only tried. It has tabuilt for the purpose of a Boarding House. The situation Pepper; 300 Alspice; 50 lbs. Calomel; 50 lbs. Nutmegs; 25 ken me nearly all the winter to do it. Do you know, lbs. Iodid Potass; 50 lbs. Mace; 10 lbs Sulph. Potass; 100 John, that I mean to be a ship-carpenter?' and the eye of the boy kindled with an aspiration of future distinction, as he adjusted the gaff of the model. 'I should like to be one, too; but I know my moth-

'She says I shall be a minister.' 'You a parson, John?'

'I have no fancy for it.' Then I certainly wouldn't do it."

'Not if your mether wanted very much to have . I don't think I would; but my mother would not want me to be anything I dislike I am sure I never could make a parson.

'Nor I either; but mother says I can.' 'You must reason her out of it.'

'How?'

'Show her what you can do. Make a boat, as I have done. I am sure you can make as good a one 'I will make a ship-that would be more difficult

-I am sure I could make one;' and there was something in the eye of John Emerson which showed that he had the energy to accomplish almost anything he should undertake. 'Good! I like your spunk. You shall work in my father's shop, and you need not tell any one what

But the task was not an easy one, and more than once the young mechanic was obliged to leave the shop and go down to the wharf to study the build of a real ship.

Joseph Broadly encouraged his friend and the work went bravely on. Though John had projected an enterprise which, if successfully accomplished, would the lot covers nearly five neres, with excellent water, and a eclipse his own labors he was not envious or ill-nachoice selection of Fruit Trees, in a bearing state; including | tured, and did all he could to assist his young friend Apples, Pears, Peaches, Plums, Cherries, Nectarines, Apri- without doing anything that would rob him of the credit of his work.

There were plenty of critics at hand, men acquainted with every timber and every rope in the ship, and their judgment was decidedly favoraable. His father and mother were summoned to the door to view the handiwork of their son. Mrs. Emerson was in ecstacies, and Mr. Emerson rubbed his hands

'Now, mother, what do you think of my talent for to the work of his hands. 'It is very pretty, isn't it, husband?' 'Now, moth .r, I am going to be a ship-builder.'

'A ship builder!' exclaimed the fond mother with evident horror 'Yes, mother; Captain Smith has offered to take like,' said Joseph, diffidently.

Don't bother the boy, wife; let him be a ship bui der, if he wants to. You see he has a talent, as well as an inclination that way,' said Mr. Emerson, as he went into the house again, followed by his wife. John bestowed the ship in the back room, and joined the family circle.

'I have set my heart on making a minister of him. It is so much more respectable than a carpenter, or $50 00 anything of that sort, continued Mrs. Emerson. 'Po h!' interposed the husband, with a contempt-

'You needn't 'pooh' me, Emerson. You know that a minister is better than a carpenter.' 'No, I don't. I entirely dissent from your view of the subject. fluence was still potent and in spite of himself, he became a minister at last. Twenty years in the swift flight of time had passed away, since the two boys stood together in the workshop, gazing at the model of the schooner.

In one of the maratime suburbs, near an extensive ship-yard, in which are four immense clipper ships on the stocks, stands a small, dingy church, bearing the most evident signs of neglect. But it is a small society, and the few who worship there find it exceedigly difficult to pay the Rev. Jno Emerson, the pastor, the meagre salary of five hundred dollars a year .been given to the work, and the young artisan sur- Mr. Joseph Broadley, the enterprising shipwright, who owns the yard near the church, it is said, pays considerably more than half of this sum, for the pastor is an old friend, and he earnestly desires to sus-tain bim. The church is in a most unprosperous condition. It has been running down for several years. One by one, the society are leaving it, preferring to walk half a mile to another church.

There is a reason for everything; and there was a reason why the Rev. John Emerson succeeded no better in building up the society over which he presided. His preaching was so insupportably dull and insipid, that it was a severe pennance to hear him,-People said he was no more fit for a preacher than Beelzebub was for a saint; and they would not hear him. They said he did not seem to care anything about his profession, and was so gloomy as well as dull, that they could not tolerate him, either in the pulpit or out of it; and if it had not been for the fact that Mr. Broadley, with all his influence, went to Harrassed by financial embarrassments, there seemed to be no hope for him, but the hope beyond the grave. What wonder that, weighed down by trials and sorrow, he was unable to preach to the satisfaction of his people?

To cap the climax, his society, in spite of the influence of Mr. Broadley, voted, at last, to request him to ask a dismission. Even the poor pittance, which had been barely sufficient to support him, was to be withdrawn, and the most abject poverty stured him in the face. In the lonliness of his study, he shed great scalding tears over his unhappy lot. The world had been full of griefs to him. Misfortune upon misfortune had been his portion, and now, a helpless servant in the vineyard, he was to be cast out a beggar. When he had sufficiently vented his anguish, he at the expiration of six months, having devoted all left the house, and walked down the ship-yard. Jo-

The fame of the shipbuilder was spread over the whole world Success had crowned him in all his undertaking. The minister was broken down, poor, and in despair.

> 'God bless you!' exclaimed the minister, and a tear of gratitude stood in his hollow eye, as he grasped the hand of his friend. 'I can never earn such a salary as that.' Nature made him for a mechanic, gave him the taste and the fitness for a mechanical calling; she > made him a minister, a profitless servant of the Great Master, because in her weakness she deemed it more respectable. 'Cheer up John; there is hope yet,' said Joseph Broadley.

'Alas! there is no hope. I can never preach again, and I am fit for nothing else now.' 'Yes you are; though I presume you do not wish to abandon your profession." 'Abandon it! With all my soul! I can serve the Lord much more acceptably in any other calling.'

'If it were not for the name of thing, I would gladly offer you a situation as a book keeper at the yard.' 'Oh, yes you can; cheer up' 'May God ever bless you. Joseph!' The arrangement was effected immediately, and the broken-minister once more had the courage to raise his head, and hope that he might yet redeom his existence from utter uselessness His old taste returned to him, after a while, and he proved to be
